

Liquidity that does not flow makes life hard for the ECB

Source: ECB, UniCredit Research

- Excess reserves in the eurozone have become a hot topic since the ECB hinted that it is studying a tiering scheme for the depo rate to ease pressure on banks. Debate on tiering among investors has gained traction also as weak economic data may require the ECB to strengthen its forward guidance on rates.
- The chart above shows some key figures on bank reserves. First, and most importantly, liquidity in the eurozone is distributed highly unevenly across jurisdictions. As of February 2019, 70% of excess reserves were in Germany, France and the Netherlands. At the same time, banks in these countries make relatively little use of T-LTROs, which offers liquidity at a rate as low as -0.40% potentially offsetting the impact on bank profitability of a negative depo rate applied to excess reserves. As a result, the costs originating from negative ECB rates are concentrated in these countries. With no exit from negative rates in sight, it is no wonder that the ECB is under pressure to do something. The chart helps to visualize vested interest.
- Concentration of excess reserves is partly related to the technical aspects of QE but mainly implies that liquidity is not circulating properly. Risk appetite and the growth outlook are very different from country to country and this ultimately discourages core countries from engaging in cross-border activity.
- Finally, the chart highlights that setting up a tiering system in the eurozone will be a tricky task, unlike in other jurisdictions. Thresholds will have to be set with a uniform rule across countries, but in a market where excess reserves are not uniformly distributed and where there are multiple types of collateral with different repo rates (government bonds issued by different countries).
